The statues were dedicated by Maj. Calvin Fudge, padre for Branch 13. Frank Coleman, honorary lieutenant-colonel of the second battalion; Brig.-Gen. Kelly Woیدن, the Canadian Army's Chief of Staff for the army reserves; and Memorial University president Gary Kachanoski each addressed the crowd of onlookers that filled the square.

Among the city's veterans to help with the unveil was Bill Hann.

As the former member of the 166 Newfoundland Field Regiment Royal Artillery during the Second World War stood beneath the Lewis gunner statue it was as if you could see into the past the statue represents.

"I thought it was a wonderful thing," Hann said of the ceremony. "It was really great."

Dave Higdon, the chair of the Forget Me Not committee, said the feeling of finally seeing the statues in place was something "you can't explain. This is unbelievable."

Higdon said the Lewis gunner as it is positioned closest to St. John the Evangelist Anglican Cathedral really gives a feel for the past, while the modern-day soldier provides a feel for the present by flanking city hall.

Higdon said the committee will continue fundraising with its plan being to erect a military plaque in front of the artillery gun on the square and two other bronze plaques will be unveiled next Remembrance Day.

"And then when we're finished here, we get this paid for, we're going down the Bay of Islands War Memo-
